Population explosion, the ability of a large percentage of the global population to travel and the relocation of larger number of individuals due to political or economic considerations have created an evolving social landscape that facilitates and enhances disease evolution and epidemic spread.

In this talk, I will highlight the challenges posed by globalization and bioterrorism in these changing social landscapes using examples from emergent or re-emergent diseases like SARS, Influenza and Tuberculosis.